THE JOY OF SUKKOT

The majesty of Rosh Hashanah has come and gone. The white-clad awe of Yom Kippur has cleansed our hearts and souls. We are now prepared for our annual outburst of joy! Sukkot, the Time of Our Rejoicing as the Torah tells us to be "only joyous" for seven full days.

This joy was realized to its fullest when the Belt Hamikdash in Jerusalem was still standing. The streets bursting with throngs of excited people from near and far. The sounds of music, singing and dancing reverberating through every window and doorway. The spectacle of an exalted people united in a common outpouring of love and gratitude to Hashem. At the center of these splendid festivities was the Simchat Beit Hasho'evah, the celebration of the drawing of the water for the water libation on the altar in the Belt Hamikdash. The Talmud draws a vivid picture of the exultant singing and dancing that accompanied this ritual and assures us that "whoever did not witness the Simchat Beit Hasho'evah has never seen true joy in his life."

But what was so remarkable about the ritual of the drawing of the water? What made it the most powerful stimulus to joy imaginable? The commentators explain that the Hebrew word for joy, simchah, is related to the word for erasing, machah. Joy is not something that must be generated. It is our natural state. The pain, sorrows and disappointments of life only overlay and obscure our natural joyousness. When we erase these impediments to our happiness, we achieve true joy by default.

On Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, we cleansed and purified our souls. On Sukkot, we are finally capable of cleaving to Hashem and achieving true joy. The water libation symbolized this concept. Water has the property of absolute adaptability. It can attach itself to any shape or form so perfectly that no gaps or crevices are left unfilled. The ritual of pouring the water over the altar in the Belt Hamikdash, therefore, symbolizes the perfect and absolute attachment which the Jewish people have achieved to Hashem through their prayers and repentance during the High Holidays. And perfect attachment leads to perfect joy and true contentment.

I look forward to seeing as many of you over the Yom Tov of Sukkot as well as to the Simchat Bet Hashoeva Sukkah Party on Thursday evening celebrating Sukkot and this year's honorees!

Shabbat Shalom and Chag Sameach!
